Review Cycle	At least annually and after material workplace or security changes

Purpose. This policy establishes expectations for employees who work remotely, whether on a regular, hybrid or approved temporary basis. It aims to support flexibility and productivity while maintaining service quality, information security, employee wellbeing and clear coordination with teams.

Fictional demonstration document for the OnBoardIQ sample knowledge base. This is an illustrative policy, not a formally approved corporate policy, legal advice or a substitute for applicable employment terms or local requirements.

1. Scope and eligibility

This policy applies to employees of Northstar Technologies Pvt. Ltd. whose roles may be performed remotely in whole or in part. Remote work may be regular, hybrid, temporary or approved as an exception. Eligibility depends on role requirements, business needs, information-security constraints, customer commitments and manager approval.

Remote work is not an automatic entitlement and does not change an employee's role, performance expectations, confidentiality obligations or applicable employment terms.

- Managers assess whether duties can be performed effectively away from company premises.
- Roles requiring physical presence, secure facilities, specialized equipment or direct on-site support may have different arrangements.
- Interns, contractors and temporary personnel follow the arrangements approved for their engagement and manager.

2. Definitions

- Remote work: performing assigned work from an approved location other than the normal company workplace.
- Hybrid work: a planned combination of remote work and work from company premises.
- Approved work location: the location accepted by the manager and, where required, HR or Security for the remote arrangement.
- Core availability: agreed periods when an employee is expected to be reachable for collaboration, meetings or operational responsibilities.

3. Approval and work arrangements

- Employees must obtain manager approval before starting a regular or recurring remote arrangement.
- The approval should record the arrangement type, expected remote and office days, start date, review date and any role-specific conditions.
- Temporary remote work may be approved for a defined period based on business needs and the employee's circumstances.
- Changes to the approved location, schedule or working pattern should be discussed with the manager in advance.
- Managers may review, modify or discontinue an arrangement when business, performance, security or operational requirements change, subject to applicable employment terms and law.

4. Working hours and availability

Employees must follow their agreed working schedule, applicable attendance rules and team coverage requirements. Remote work does not by itself change scheduled hours or overtime and break arrangements.

- Keep calendar availability and work status reasonably current.
- Attend required team meetings, customer calls and scheduled handovers.
- Inform the manager promptly about delays, connectivity problems, emergencies or inability to work.
- Coordinate time-zone differences and handoffs for cross-functional or distributed teams.
- Record attendance and working time through the approved company process.
- Follow applicable rules for breaks, overtime, holidays and leave.

5. Communication and collaboration

- Use approved company communication and collaboration tools for business discussions and records.
- Respond within reasonable team-agreed timeframes, taking urgency and working hours into account.
- Document important decisions, task ownership, blockers and handovers in the designated project or ticketing system.

- Use video meetings, chat, email or asynchronous updates according to the needs of the task rather than expecting constant online presence.
- Protect confidential discussions from being overheard by unauthorized people.

6. Performance and accountability

- Employees remain accountable for agreed deliverables, quality, deadlines, customer commitments and professional conduct.
- Managers should set clear goals, priorities, ownership and measurable outcomes.
- Performance should be assessed using role-relevant work outcomes and established company processes, not simply online status or message volume.
- Raise workload, dependency or delivery risks early and agree corrective actions with the manager.
- Remote employees must follow applicable code-of-conduct, anti-harassment and workplace policies.

7. Equipment and workspace

- Use company-issued devices and approved software for company work unless an exception has been authorized.
- Keep devices physically secure and prevent access by family members, visitors or other unauthorized people.
- Maintain a workspace that supports safe, effective work and protects company information.
- Use approved accessories and follow device-care and asset-management instructions.
- Report lost, stolen, damaged or malfunctioning company equipment promptly.
- Return company assets when requested, when the arrangement ends or at separation, following the applicable asset-return procedure.

8. Information security and privacy

Remote employees must follow the IT Security Policy, Data Classification and Handling Policy, and other applicable security requirements. Working outside company premises does not reduce the employee's responsibility to protect information.

- Connect through approved secure access methods, such as company VPN or managed zero-trust access, where required.
- Use multi-factor authentication and never share passwords, session tokens or authentication devices.
- Keep operating systems, endpoint protection and approved applications updated.
- Lock the screen when away and prevent shoulder-surfing or unauthorized viewing.
- Avoid public or shared computers for company work.
- Use caution on public Wi-Fi; use approved secure connectivity and avoid handling sensitive information in exposed environments.
- Store company files only in approved repositories; do not move them to personal email, consumer cloud storage or removable media without authorization.
- Do not print confidential documents at home unless explicitly permitted and securely handled.
- Report suspected phishing, malware, credential exposure, device loss or data disclosure promptly through the approved incident channel.

9. Location, travel and cross-border work

Employees should work from the location approved for their arrangement. Working temporarily from another city or country may create security, tax, employment, privacy, insurance or regulatory implications and must be approved in advance by the appropriate HR, Legal, Security and business owners.

Employees must not assume that a short trip or personal travel automatically permits work from another jurisdiction. Approval may be refused where the company cannot meet its obligations or protect its information.

10. Health, safety and wellbeing

- Set up a reasonably safe and ergonomic workspace and take appropriate breaks.
- Report work-related injuries, safety concerns or equipment hazards through the applicable company process.
- Maintain reasonable boundaries between working time and personal time.
- Discuss sustained workload, isolation, accessibility or wellbeing concerns with the manager or HR.
- Follow applicable health and safety requirements and any role-specific guidance.

11. Expenses and connectivity

- Any reimbursement for internet, phone, furniture, utilities or other remote-work expenses must follow the current expense policy and receive required approval.
- Do not assume that all home-office or connectivity costs are reimbursable.
- Use reliable connectivity appropriate to the role and notify the manager if an outage affects work.
- For critical duties, agree a fallback plan such as an approved alternate connection or temporary work location.

12. Confidentiality and household considerations

- Keep company conversations and screens private from household members and visitors.
- Do not allow another person to use a company device or access a company account.
- Use headphones for confidential calls where appropriate.
- Secure paper notes and dispose of them using approved confidential-waste procedures.
- Do not discuss customer, employee or company-sensitive matters in public places where others may overhear.

13. Manager responsibilities

- Assess role suitability and approve arrangements consistently against business needs.
- Set clear deliverables, availability expectations and communication norms.
- Ensure remote employees know how to access approved tools, support and security guidance.
- Monitor outcomes and address performance or collaboration concerns fairly.
- Coordinate office attendance, customer coverage, equipment and access needs.
- Escalate security, safety or employee-relations concerns through the appropriate process.

14. Ending or changing a remote arrangement

Remote-work arrangements may be reviewed at agreed intervals or when role, team, performance, security or business requirements change. The manager should communicate material changes and coordinate with HR where required.

When an arrangement ends, the employee must return or relocate company equipment as instructed, remove any approved temporary access configuration where directed, and resume the required work location and schedule.

15. Exceptions and non-compliance

Exceptions must be documented with the business reason, duration, approved location, risk considerations, responsible manager and any compensating security controls. Cross-border arrangements or exceptions involving sensitive information require additional review by the relevant functions.

Failure to follow this policy may result in withdrawal of remote-work approval, additional security controls or other action under applicable company procedures and employment terms.

16. Employee remote-work checklist

- My remote or hybrid arrangement and work location are approved.
- I understand my working hours, availability and attendance requirements.
- I use approved devices, applications and secure connectivity.
- My workspace protects company information and supports safe work.
- I store and share company data only through approved channels.
- I know how to report device loss, security incidents and connectivity issues.
- I understand expense, equipment-return and cross-border approval requirements.

17. Policy ownership and review

Human Resources owns this policy and coordinates review with IT Operations, Security and relevant business leaders. Review it at least annually and when workplace arrangements, security requirements or applicable employment obligations materially change.
